

MATT HOFMAN
MS Bible/Math, HS Bible
Philosophy of Education

Christian education has its foundation in the Creator-creature relationship taught in the Bible. God made humans and put them into relationships with Him, with fellow humans, and with the rest of creation. As a result of the fall into sin, these relationships were severely damaged. Through the death of His Son, Jesus Christ, God has graciously enabled us to restore these relationships, and one way we attempt to do so is through Christian education.

The responsibility to educate children to walk in God's ways rests primarily upon the parents. They may choose to delegate part of this responsibility to the Christian school, which not only reinforces the Biblical training taught in the home but also expands a child's knowledge of God's world from a Biblical perspective.

The fact that God has authority over every area of life is foundational to Christian education. The children that are taught and the subjects that they study belong to God. Therefore, all learning should be centered on God since it is His world that is being studied. Each subject taught, then, is viewed as a marvelous gift from our Creator. Children are taught to recognize God's original and perfect plan for each area of creation and are led to restore, develop, and use these areas for His honor and glory.

To be specific, in the area of mathematics students see the inherent orderliness of God's creation and learn to rule over the created world through knowledge of math. Whether a student will be building houses, writing computer software, practicing medicine, defending our nation, or pastoring a congregation he/she will need to use and understand mathematics. In Bible class, students are taught that "all scripture is useful for teaching, rebuking, correcting, and training in righteousness so that the man of God may be thoroughly equipped for every good work." (2 Timothy 3:16-17) These verses clearly outline our responsibility to teach the Bible to children.

Finally, the students that are taught are not seen merely as "blank slates" that are filled with facts and knowledge. Instead, they are image bearers of the Creator and as such are spiritual beings with physical, social, and emotional needs. Christian education not only seeks to meet these needs at the present time but also trains the student to understand that the only way to satisfy those longings is through a relationship with the Creator. The primary goals of the curriculum, therefore, are to convince students of their fallen state, lead them to see Jesus Christ as their Savior, and teach them how to live lives of service in thankfulness to Him.